Ancient Bsdus tha Academy was in Rebgong Monastery. In the early twentieth century it was a good place for philosophy learners. Monks learned how to read many scriptures and learned the process of making Tibetan arts. They learned how to ask questions about existing things and hidden, invisible things. They energetically debated these issues. When they debated, it sounded like a concert was playing.

One day a Tibetan man from a pasture went to Rebgong. He was wealthy. He went to Rebgong Monastery to visit a monk. The monk was his relative. He walked through the big entrance of the monastery. He was impressed by the majestic high walls of the temples. Then he thought he might see things that he had not seen before. First he went to Rta mgrin Temple. He heard monks chanting. He also saw many books with original covers. He didn't know what the books were about. He asked a monk at the temple.

The monk replied, "The books are mostly scriptures. They were published more than a century ago. Recently the monks have published a Tibetan-Chinese dictionary."

The visitor couldn't see the dictionaries clearly because they were hidden under the scriptures. He could only see the thick flat, wooden board covers. He wasn't very interested, because he wasn't very interested in this topic. Then he left the temple and walked in the monastery yard. He suddenly heard the sound of a crowd. He thought people were fighting! He rushed over and yelled, "Hey! Don't fight! Don't fight!"

He didn't see them pound each other, but he heard them shouting. He didn't have any clue what they were fighting about.

Then a gentleman said, "It is not a fight. It is just a debate." The visitor then stopped yelling and left. That evening his monk relative took him to a Tibetan theater in the County town. Tibetan actors were performing. The monk bought two tickets from an officer. They joyfully spent a few hours there.

From this experience, he learned a lot and concluded, "Don't make a conclusion until you understand things clearly.
